

Post-event (Oct 26)

- I wasn't sure if I took enough video, but it wasn't as bad as I thought

Based on some napkin math, this is probably ~~or~~ a little less than half an hour of footage. ~~Worst~~ Worst case scenario, I can supplement with talking heads but I'm aiming for using official press images from their archive.

I didn't get all types of footage I wanted. I see why travel vloggers often come in pairs—when you have a subject to film in the space, it gives an action/reaction, someone to illustrate interaction, and cuts the pressure from filming strangers. It feels less creepy!

I brought an external battery, but it definitely wasn't enough. It was rough to find places with outlets - there was an exhibit where you could lock your phone away for charging but I'm not doing that travelling solo :-

It would have definitely been nice having press cred, to ~~the~~ have a charging/decompression space

Next time, I'd definitely want an extrovert with me to be on film, etc. ~~What's~~ I also wanted to talk to more people, ask for advice on where to go, etc. - thematically, I want to emphasize the pro-social elements of events in arts & culture.

I would also have in more of a hook in the future for such a large event, going in with more of a plan for the angle/story would at least make post production easier.

From the personal enjoyment level, going for such an overview ~~event~~ with an emphasis on visual spectacle meant I skimmed a lot of the ~~stuff~~ exhibits, unfortunately. It wasn't the frame I usually like to take - Honestly, I think a written review would be more my speed.

It also burned me tf out. I needed like 3 recovery days - I definitely couldn't do constant travel/event attendance.

I am feeling confident about the role of producer, though!
The pre-production planning into production was enjoyable & I think it used my skillset well.

Next step will be ~~editing~~ post production: recording the voice over & then editing. I like my delivery better when it's a bit off-the-cuff (not a script), so I'll draft bullet points & record a few takes with voice notes.

For November's video I definitely want to stick closer. It would be cool to get some sort of press credentials or backstage access - it could be cool to do even a zoom interview (so it's easy to record, taking the A/V logistics out of it).

Even just engaging ~~with the~~ with the organizers for pre-production ~~embodiment~~ & formulating the story pitch. A more journalistic approach could help organize the production process. In part, because it's the standard collaboration format btw cultural producers & media, plus the story format audiences are seeking (opening night reviews etc)
